This multiplayer browser version is available for.Restaurants in Quebec and Ontario are being asked to close their doors to prevent the spread of COVID-19, and in the case of many local Chinese restaurants, the stakes are higher than that. In Quebec, local Chinese restaurants, like the ones found in suburbs or small towns, are now required to keep the table service, including seating and the ordering of take-out food, only for delivery, pickup and in-house take-out orders. Other restaurants are currently being asked to temporarily close or only allow take-out orders. Restaurants are also being asked to not allow any public or in-person employee-only gatherings. This goes for both employees and customers, meaning that every place that offers take-out service or delivery has to ask its customers to stay at home, or outside of their business. In several provinces, including Quebec, Ontario, Nova Scotia, Manitoba, and Newfoundland and Labrador, restaurants have already shut down their physical operations. This has left more than 2,000 people out of work in the Atlantic provinces. In Quebec, this includes hundreds of employees of Cappy's Chinese restaurant, on Montreal's Martin Street. Famous for serving a huge variety of Chinese staples, they are located on the city's mainstream strip of restaurants and fast-food spots, with a big variety of colours and languages right outside their doors. The restaurant doesn't offer its regular take-out service, and while the owners and staff haven't been affected by the coronavirus outbreak, they are still in a position to lose their jobs. In the case of Cappy's, the government has been urged by the employees and customers to send the owners to an online ordering platform or to deliver food that can be prepared on-site.
